On Tuesday next the town will see,
Beyond the slightest doubt,
A "sure for sartain" gala day,
The kind you read about.
You'll see within our little burg,
In spite of porkers' squeals,
A goodly train of citizens
And half the town on wheels.

Notice.

Business men desiring to make use of the columns of the DAILY BULLETIN during the week of the fair will please hand in their advertisements immediately, otherwise we may be obliged to disappoint some of them as our space is limited.

What a Little Reader Says.

MAYSVILLE, Ky., Sept. 15, 1882.
ED. BULLETIN:—I am a little girl and this is my first attempt at poetry, and I hope you will print it. I read the DAILY BULLETIN every day.

I love the DAILY BULLETIN

With all its news and fun,

And yet no paper of this town

With it a race can run.

It is a little treasure

That always will be prized,

By me above all papers

Though found in modest guise.

A Dangerous Bedfellow.

Wisconsin State Journal.

Ferryman Hoppy, of Arena, Wis., recently experienced a fearful sensation on awakening during the night. He felt something crawling over him, and knew, when fairly awake. He did not know what to do, but finally took both hands and threw the bed clothes over it and got on it with his knees. The reptile immediately coiled its tail around his neck, he being on its head. By repeated efforts he succeeded in uncoiling it, but not before he was nearly strangled. He gathered up snake and clothes, together threw them from the window that was open near the bed, and then as quickly as he could get out of doors caught up a pole and struck the snake a blow. He could see him coiled up and hear the rattle, showing it to be a very large rattlesnake. As he struck the reptile coiled around the pole, and as he raised the pole to strike again it sent the snake away out in the river. It was a close call for Mr. Hoppy. He doesn't like such bedfellows, and has wire screens to his windows now.
